A: There is an XLS file in the same location, but that's not required for the QC. Also, if you do this via the QC, you do not need to download the file into your local computer. You would only download it if you were doing the actual QC. (for example, if you give someone instructions to add a line, then they can get the resulting program using the xls file) This application relates generally to the operation of memory devices, such as non-volatile memory, and, more particularly, to computer systems and methods of storing a threshold value for a counter associated with a memory device. Solid-state memory devices are considered to be a future generation memory device to be used as the mass storage medium for portable computers, digital cameras, cellular telephones, personal digital assistants, etc. Since an embedded controller directly operates the solid-state memory device, the solid-state memory device is called a non-volatile memory device. In addition, the solid-state memory device has a relatively high operating speed, is non-volatile, and has a small size. The solid-state memory device includes a number of memory cells. The memory cells are divided into a plurality of sectors in which a plurality of memory cells are arranged, and each of the memory cells are commonly connected to a common bit line for accessing the memory cells. The solid-state memory device includes a plurality of word lines connected to a plurality of the sectors. The word lines are commonly connected to a plurality of row decoders. The row decoders are commonly connected to a plurality of sense amplifiers, which are used to amplify the data of the selected memory cells. In a case of a NAND flash memory device, the data of the selected memory cells are read and amplified by the sense amplifiers. The amplified data are in turn latched in a page buffer. Thereafter, the page buffer is programmed according to the data stored in the page buffer.
