Photoshop is only a tool; it is not an art form. Many editors of images are creative types. However, Photoshop is great for getting something to the point that a creative person can understand and perhaps use it. Photoshop has two major, and quite different, features: Raster graphics: Raster images are just what they sound like: images in which each pixel is represented by a dot. The pixels are arranged in a grid on a computer screen. Raster images can be drawn, beamed, photographed, or sculpted into almost anything. The easiest way to create an image is by using the Layers feature. Each layer represents a color or pattern that you've added to the image. You can add layer masks to create transparency for layer overlays. Vector graphics: Vector images have no pixels. An image created in Adobe Illustrator is a vector image. It can be created and edited with any graphics program that handles vectors, or drawing tools. After you create and arrange vector objects, you can then scale and resize them, which can be useful for some types of art. However, vector images can be viewed and manipulated with any graphics editor without scaling artifacts and can be saved as any file type. The Layers and Vector tools of Photoshop provide two separate but similar functions: Layers: Layers are a dynamic way of managing the contents of an image or of creating a combination of more than one image within an image. Layers are essentially a workflow that lets you organize and handle several images, a single image, or some combination of both in your project in a nonlinear manner. Vector tools: Vector tools such as the Pencil tool (Pencil Selection), the Rectangle tool (Rectangle Selection), and the Freeform tool (Freeform Selection) allow you to easily create and edit shapes and text. What's more, you can combine the two tools and use the layers as your vector tool palette. That is, rather than saving each individual object to its own layer, you can actually combine several objects into one layer and edit them as if they were separate objects. Searching for MovieMaker MovieMaker is a tool that also comes with Photoshop. It allows you to create and manipulate videos. Some users think of it as an advanced version of Photoshop's ability to create still images. Movie

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to the field of database management and in particular to the field of query optimizer evaluation during database management. 2. Background of the Invention Query optimizers are very important tools for optimizing queries. A database is a collection of data usually organized in tables. The data in the database is often structured, relational, and accessed by queries, which are data retrieving or manipulation applications. These queries can be constructed from Structured Query Language (SQL), which is a standard or a common language used to access data in relational database management systems (RDBMS). SQL can take many forms, such as structured query language (SQL), procedural SQL, enhanced SQL, or any other form supported by the RDBMS used. The SQL queries can be used in data entry, data analysis, data management, and data control. The SQL queries typically are composed of a set of predefined clauses called tables. A clause is a grouping of words or phrases that has an open logical end. For instance, SELECT is a clause, and SELECT * FROM TABLE is a clause. A table can include attributes, which are data fields or columns that store data. When a query is composed from the predefined clauses, the optimizer evaluates the resulting query to determine the best plan for accessing and processing the data using the predefined clauses. It is desirable to perform query optimization efficiently to enhance the efficiency of query processing. The goal of optimization is to transform a query to its most efficient form. The presence of table aliases within a SQL query, the order of these aliases, or the presence of table groupings are some of the factors used by the optimizer in analyzing a query. A table alias allows a table to be referenced more than once within the same query. For instance, "x.y" means that "x" can be used repeatedly throughout the query. However, a table alias is limited to the scope of the query within which it was created. A group refers to any SQL construct that can be used as a grouping of tables. An example of a group is the FROM clause, which lists all the tables in the query. The optimizer uses some heuristics to evaluate the query. Typically, the optimizer uses various factors to determine which table to access first. One example of a factor is the table with the most columns in the query. This is called the table with the greatest number of columns, which is typically the first table of a given query.

The embodiments herein relate to authentication process, and more particularly, to an Authentication Method that an Client App and a Web Server are required to share, as well as a Form Management System and a related method thereof. Authentication has long been a complicated and an important topic in the area of Computer Science. Authentication has become more and more important as the number of users connected with the Internet increases, which requires applications to be more and more reliable. The web applications can be classified into three categories according to the security level. The first class of applications has a low security level. When using these applications, generally, the user is not required to provide sensitive information such as password and ID. The second class of applications has a middle security level. When using these applications, generally, the user is required to provide a sensitive password and ID. When the password is valid, the user is authenticated. However, the password and ID information are usually sent from the user's terminal (or computer) to the server by the user. This kind of method usually raises security problems, because the password and ID could be captured by the user, then changed to fool the server. The third class of applications has a high security level. When using these applications, generally, the user is required to provide password and ID by means of a login operation. When the password and ID are valid, the user is authenticated. The passwords and IDs used by the user are usually encrypted. After authenticated by the server, the user is assigned a session token. The session token is used to identify the user when the user accesses the web server. In a traditional internet authentication process, there are two corresponding servers, i.e. a client server and a web server. After the client computer and the web server communicate with each other by using an authentication process, the client computer is authenticated. The authentication process usually includes the following steps: Step 1, an account manager (hereinafter referred to as "AM") of the client computer sets up a corresponding web login operation. Step 2, after receiving the login operation, a web server of the web application automatically populates a web form according to the login operation. The web form is also referred to as a web login form. Step 3, after receiving the web login form, the web server and the client computer authenticate the user and assign a session token to the user. Step 4, after the authentication is completed, the web server sends the web login form to the client
