A system that consists of a pool of water, a sodium thiosulfate solution and a membrane as well as a radon mitigation system (RMS) has been proposed. The RMS is supposed to bring about a simultaneous decrease in the concentration of radon in air as well as the number of radon-containing particles in a room. The efficiency of this system is analysed with a compartment model that is linear as well as nonlinear. The results show that the relative decrease in the concentration of radon in air as well as the number of radon-containing particles produced by the RMS is independent of the ratio between the number of downward and upward particles. The ratio between downward and upward particles is a quantity that is within the range of 1.1-4.8. The efficiency of the system also depends on the filtration rate of the membrane, on the duration of filtration and on the quantity of thiosulfate in the pool./* =====
